Unconventionally Acquired Brain Injury: "A cluster of neurosensory and cognitive symptoms of unknown etiology/origin with at least one of the following symptoms: vestibular deficits/disturbances, oculomotor deficits, headaches/head pressure, anxiety, sleep impairment, light sensitivity, nose bleeds, ear pain, disrupted executive function, disorientation, auditory symptoms, vision changes, and nausea. A secondary phase of symptoms related to vestibular disturbances or cognitive deficits may potentially present after the initial phase." – Unconventionally Acquired Brain Injury Guidance and Instruction About an Emerging Challenge to Warfighter Brain Health, Adam T. Biggs, PhD; Sarah M. Henry, PhD; Scott L. Johnston, PhD; David R. Whittaker, MD; Lanny F. Littlejohn, MD // US Special Operations Command, Policy Memo 20-02: Unconventionally acquired brain injury reporting and health guidance for Special Operations Forces, Tampa, FL; 2020

NeuroStrike: Entails the covert utilization of combined RF, low MHz acoustic, nanotech, and electromagnetic technologies to inflict direct, non-kinetic, permanent neurological damage and cognitive degradation clandestinely. It targets unwitting individuals using a focused energy beam for several minutes, resulting in lifelong neuro-cognitive injury. [Reference: McCreight/2018 and Small Wars Journal, Neuro-Cognitive Warfare: Inflicting Strategic Impact via Non-Kinetic Threat 9-16-2022 [McCreight], and see also Havana Syndrome— a series of targeted neurological attacks against diplomats, intelligence experts, and military personnel since 2015, leading to memory loss, impaired gait, vestibular injury, and confirmed brain damage. Such attacks persist to this day. [Reference: National Academy of Sciences report, Dec 2020]

Analysis of the NeuroStrike Program: Unveiling CCP's Advanced Warfare Strategy

The NeuroStrike program represents a significant leap in the realm of military technology, positioning the CCP at the forefront of a new domain in warfare. This program is a testament t the CCP's commitment to integrating advanced technology with military strategy, aimed at developing capabilities that transcend traditional kinetic warfare.

Development of the Program: The NeuroStrike program was initiated as part of a broader strategy by the CCP to gain a strategic advantage in asymmetric warfare. This initiative is root in the CCP's perception of modern warfare, where cognitive and psychological dominance is a crucial as physical supremacy. The program has evolved over the years, leveraging advancements in neuroscience, biotechnology, and information technology. It is a multidisciplinary endeavor, incorporating insights from military science, psychology, and technology.

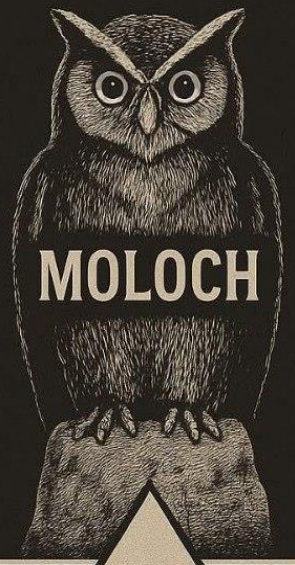

Technological Aspects: At the core of the NeuroStrike program is the development of technologies capable of targeting mammalian brains. This involves the use of microwave and directed energy weapons, which can be deployed through various platforms, ranging from handheld devices to broader electromagnetic spectrum tools. The technology is designed to impair cognitive functions, diminish situational awareness, and induce long-term neurological degradation. Furthermore, the program explores the use of human-computer interfaces and oth bio-technological advancements, aiming to control or influence large populations.

A critical technological aspect of the NeuroStrike program is its emphasis on non-kinetic mean of warfare. This approach signifies a departure from traditional weaponry, focusing instead on incapacitating the enemy through cognitive and psychological means. Such technologies are n limited to battlefield scenarios but have broader applications in psychological warfare and population control.

MK-ULTRA, COINTELPRO and the Threat Within—Psychiatry and Politics in the U.S.

The CIA's MK-ULTRA covertly funded experiments on unwilling subjects—among them, hallucinogens and electroshock, memory erasure and psychological "re-patterning."

The FBI's COINTELPRO unleashed psychological harassment techniques, targeting civil rights leaders, protestors, communists, and perceived radicals across America.

In both programs, psychiatry became an extension of politics, manipulating minds in the name of national security. For some, this led to trauma—or even commitment.

1955–LABORATORY EXPERIMENT DELGADO: RADIO-CONTROLLED BRAIN BEHAVIOR

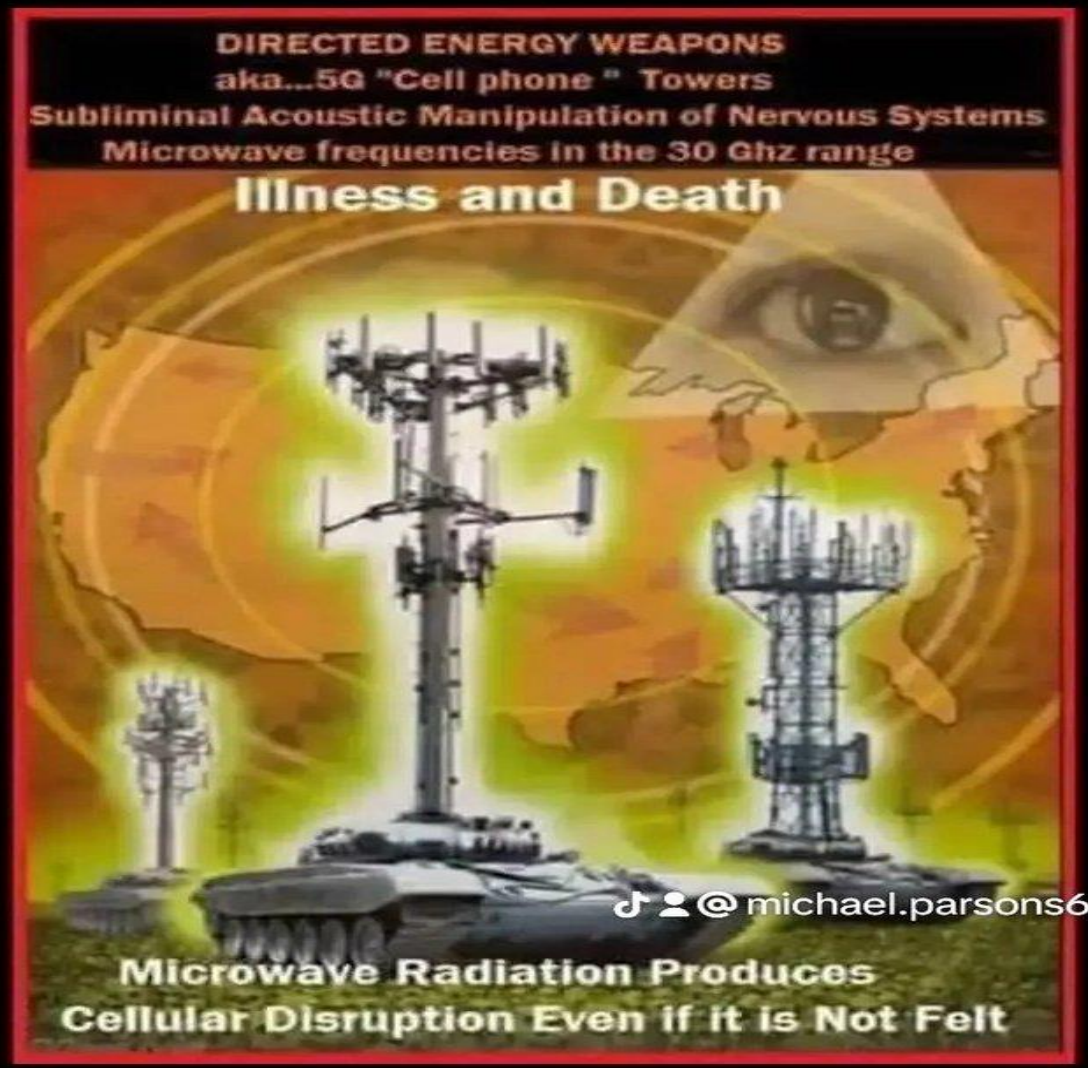

FIRST SUCCESSFUL TESTS WITH ANIMAL RADIOMODULTION

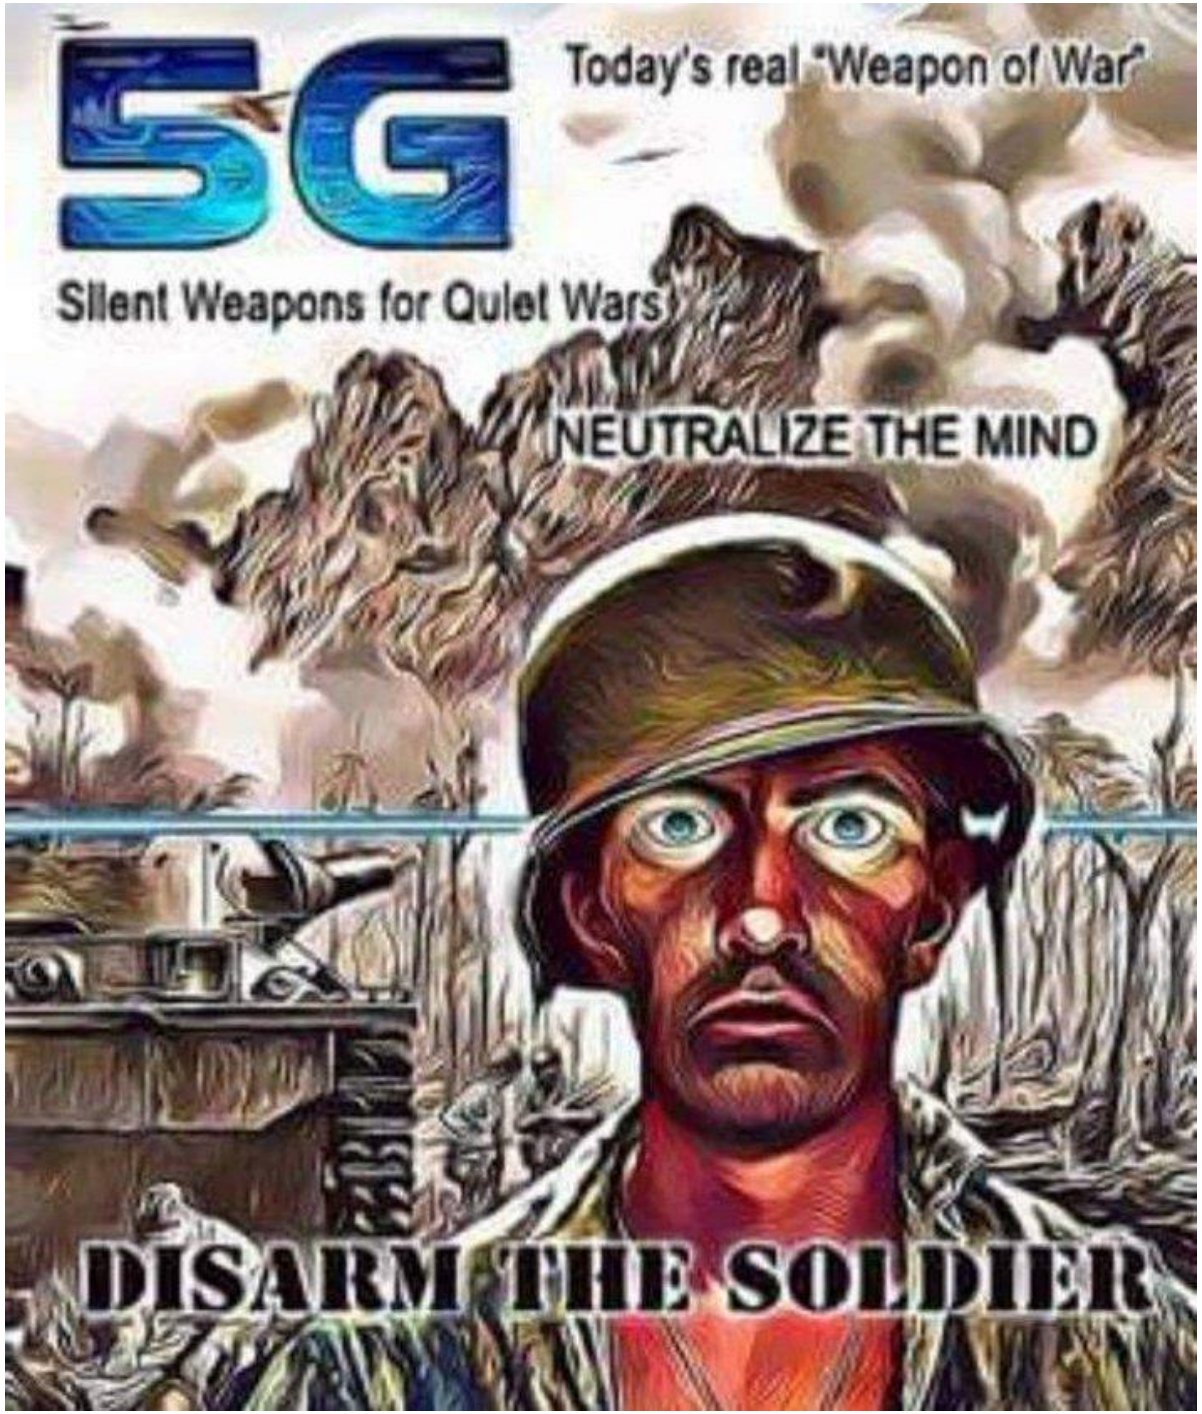

In 1955, Spanish neurophysiologist José Manuel Rodríguez Delgado conducted groundbreaking laboratory experiments on animals. By implanting electrodes in the brain and sending radio signals, he was able to remotely influence behavior — including that of a bull.
These early experiments in brain stimulation showed that aggression and obedience could be modulated externally. They marked a milestone in neurocontrol research.
The famous demonstration in the Cordoba arena — where Delgado stopped a charging bull with the push of a button — took place later, in 1963, bringing him global attention.

Barrie Trower

Barrie Trower: The Spy Who Spoke the Silent Frequencies

Barrie Trower is a former Royal Navy microwave weapons specialist and intelligence officer for the UK military.

For decades, he worked in classified programs that developed stealth technologies — not to kill, but to control.

Weapons that don't leave scars.

Weapons that whisper, pulse, and penetrate — through walls, through bodies, through time.

When he left military service, he began to speak.

Quietly.

Scientifically.

Relentlessly.

He described how specific microwave frequencies could be tuned to target the human nervous system, interfere with thought patterns, provoke emotional states, or even simulate illness.

He explained how frequencies used for "communications" could double as weapons of influence, torture, or sterilization.

"You can make people depressed.

Suicidal.

Or simply too tired to protest."

He warned of experiments on women and children — teachers, pregnant mothers, female soldiers — many unknowingly used in field trials for long-term exposure.

He revealed that microwave-based weapons were being tested and deployed by NATO and allied countries — often against their own populations.

He exposed the cover-ups in academia and the military, and criticized wireless infrastructure as a "global assault vector" masquerading as progress.

Trower wasn't just a whistleblower.

He became a defender — working with schools, legal teams, and advocacy groups to protect civilians from invisible harm.

"This isn't about paranoia," he said.

"This is about physics. And it's very real."

Dismissed by institutions but embraced by activists, Barrie Trower remains a quiet giant in the global effort to expose electromagnetic warfare.

James Giordano

When the System Speaks Honestly

Dr. James Giordano is not a whistleblower in the traditional sense.

He's a neuroscientist, military consultant, and bioethicist — who speaks publicly about weapons most experts still deny exist.

He doesn't speak from the outside.

He stands inside the system — and describes its plans with chilling clarity.

"The brain is the battlefield of the 21st century," he told military audiences.

For decades, Giordano has advised the Pentagon, NATO, and DARPA on neuroweapons, behavioral control, and non-lethal warfare using the nervous system as a direct target.

He outlines the capabilities openly:

Remote disruption of thought, emotion, or memory

Targeted alteration of beliefs and behaviors

Synthetic mental illness to discredit dissidents

Weaponized neurotoxins and electromagnetic pulses

He explains how cognitive liberty is being redefined — not with brute force, but through networks of influence that shape perception, identity, and consent itself.

Giordano often emphasizes the ethical risks.

But his presentations reveal how far the infrastructure has already developed.

"We're not talking about science fiction," he says.

"This is real. This is now."

To some, he's a rare insider telling the truth.

To others, a messenger of dystopia.

Either way, his words remove all doubt:

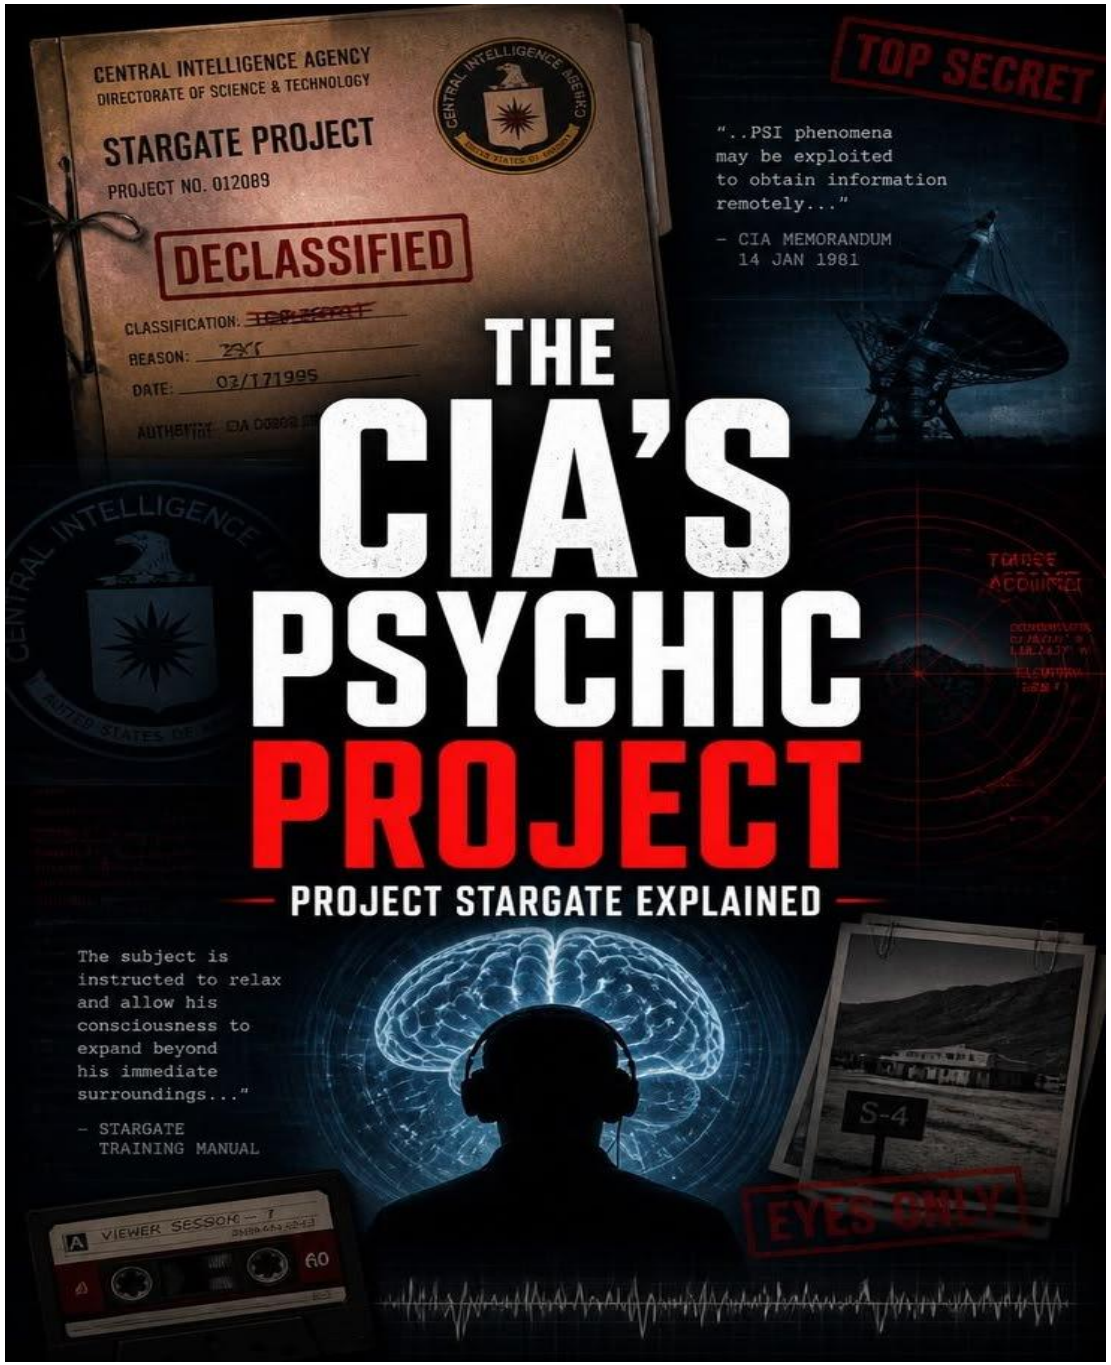

Neurotechnology is not future warfare — it's already the present.
