Brief Comment

Living close to the bridge between the US and Mexico, I used to have a lot of telephone calls cut off abruptly. I was told that this was because I lived close to the bridge and that soon there would be new technology installed at the bridge that would make my cell phone service improve. My phone service did seem to improve, although I was never provided with any notification of new technology installed near my home. Last October, walking home from the downtown post office, I had a crippling cramp in my posterior. I took my cell phone out of my back pocket on the off-chance that it might be the cause of the cramp. To my surprise, by the time I arrived home, the cramp had stopped. A couple of weeks later my left thigh bone started to feel hot and had a lot of pain. Soon, that pain spread to my hip and then to my spine. Until you are sure that the surge in technological wave output and health issues are not related, it would be irresponsible of you to allow it. If you are paid to represent the best interest of the US taxpayers, then it is the US taxpayers who must be protected.
