Comments to FCC on Notice of Inquiry, ET Docket No. 13-84

I am writing this comment to let you know that the current RFR exposure limits have impacted my well being, and have caused me to have health problems.

I owned a beautiful home on three acres near the top of a hill in Vermont, and lived there for 25 years, where our two children were raised. After a microwave tower providing a wireless internet service was placed on the roof of a neighbor's home, I decided to move because my health was affected. I became dizzy and had headaches when I went outside to enjoy my yard and garden.

After the move my health issues disappeared. Just recently, almost two years later, I had the courage to drive back to see my old home. Within minutes I developed a severe headache, which lasted several hours after I left the hillside immediately.

In my new home I have no wireless internet or phone service (I use a Comcast wired service). In my office at work (a university) I have disabled any wireless devices or features connected to my computer. I have no problems with headaches in these environments. I have gotten headaches when in a room of people using wireless devices (such as iPads), sitting next to other people using wireless devices in buses and airplanes, and when I drive past cell towers located near highways in cities.

I believe that it is important for the FCC to do more research as to the health effects of wireless technologies. I am especially concerned for the safety and wellbeing of children, who I assume could be more vulnerable to exposure because of their size.
